GROUND FIVE, Continuation.

Counsel has a Sixth Amendment constitutional duty to undertake a reasonable investigation into his client's case and background before making strategic legal decisions to give up a defense. The failure to investigate and present available evidence about Defendant Taylor's medical condition, which demonstrates that in 2013, as a result of being shot in the femeral artery, requiring three major surgeries and just missed amputation of his leg, Defendant was diagnosed with "restless leg syndrome," making it impossible for him to run again and forcing him to walk with a canepermanently, which he was doing at the time of his arrest, is particularly egregious in this case. The defense in this case was primarily mistaken identity; and given all the evidence, it seems doubtful that Defendant Taylor was the perpetrator.

Petitioner Taylor suffers from restless leg syndrome, a condition affecting people after they have recovered from being shot in the leg. The condition results in fatigue and total muscle weakness, both in the parts of the body affected by the restless leg syndrome and sometimes in other muscle groups as well. As a result of this condition, Mr. Taylor is required to walk permanently with a cane, which he was using when arrested. His condition is described as not resulting in a limp, but a "paralytic abnormal gait." In other words, completely unable to run.

Petitioner Taylor argues that he was denied effective assistance of counsel because trial counsel failed adequately to investigate the medical facts about reless leg syndrome and its effect on Taylor's physical abilities. Taylor's attorney did not investigate because as shown in Ground One, he never appeared after five months of the pretrial preparation period until the day before trial was to start.

Indeed, counsel failed to obtain an opinion from any medical professional before trial on whether Taylor was able to perform the physical act necessary to run and escape committing an armed robbery. Nor was there any medical proof about how Taylor was able to run away from the scene in the matter described by the victim. Without this knowledge, or at least an opinion, counsel could not make a competent strategic decision on whether the information would have been helpful. Wores of all, there is no attempt by counsel to explain the disability condition or its effect on Taylor before the jury in the record. Had counsel talked to a medical professional he would have discovered that it would have been difficult, if not utterly impossible, for Taylor to commit the crime as described in the testimony.

Habeas relief should be issued on this issue.
